AWARD OF THE ARBITRATOR

The grievors were called for straight-away through freight service. That was the nature of their regular assignment, which they performed. They were not called for "extra service", although they did perform certain switching, not in connection with their own train, which work was paid for as part of initial terminal time.

It is the Company's prerogative to designate the type of service it requires to have performed. It must, however, use the correct designation for the service required. It is the service which controls the rate of payment. In this case the grievors were called for their regular freight service run, and that was in fact the work performed. The collective agreement contemplates that there may be circumstances where a crew, called for one type of service, performs additional work as well. That is the case here. The crew were paid for that additional work. They were not, however, "called for extra service" within the meaning of article 9.9, and so would not be entitled to a minimum day in respect of that work, in addition to their payment for the service for which they were called.

For the foregoing reasons, the grievance is dismissed.
